- In late April, Metropolitan Airports Commission (MAC) Executive Director and CEO Jeff Hamiel announced results of a new economic impact study. The data should quell any doubts that Minneapolis-St. Paul International Airport (MSP) is among the most economically productive 3,400 acres between the Mississippi and Seattle.

The study found that MSP injects $10.1 billion into the Twin Cities area economy.

"Results of the study illustrate how vital the airport is to the strength of the area economy," said Dan Boivin, chairman of the MAC, which owns and operates MSP.

The study also found that MSP supports an estimated 76,340 jobs and generates $2.97 billion in employee earnings, including $1.2 billion directly tied to airport operations, $600 million indirectly tied to operations, $600 million induced by operations and $70 million related to MSP capital improvements.
